It works in the following modes of operation: The other, or same, point is that in privacy-aware organizations the central authorities likely to have access to the master key or the master public key are likely to be trustworthy persons who will not casually disclose encryption keys. (The encryption key may be quite a lengthy string of random data, but a skilled person could crack it given enough effort). It is not that hard to protect against this scenario if you're working with people you can trust. To further clarify, if you buy a product from a store then you do not really know the person from whom the seller bought the product. There could be many fake dealers in the same store, and they are all likely to sell fake products. But you know that whatever you buy from the store is really the product sold by the people you know.
